Ford helps drivers buckle up

Ford Motor Company wants to remind customers to buckle up and plans to offer a safety belt reminder feature in the full line of cars, trucks, minivans and sport utility vehicles it sells in Canada.

"Ford cares about its customers, and we want to make sure people remember to use the most effective safety devices in their cars and trucks — the safety belts," said Jac Nasser, Ford's president and chief executive officer.

"That's why Ford will begin introducing our new belt-minder system in vehicles later this year — at no cost to customers. The belt minder system will use a safety belt usage sensor located in the belt buckle to determine whether a driver is buckled up.

The sensor feeds this information to a control module.

If a driver is unbelted when the vehicle is in motion, a red light in the instrument panel will illuminate and a chime will intermittently sound to remind customers to use their safety belts.

In time, the system will be expanded to offer front seat passengers the same type of reminder.
