THE ENVIRONMENT: Monitoring pollution in York Region

Region gets air-quality station

BY MIKE ADLER
Staff Writer

A shed full of sophisticated equipment will find out if the Oak Ridges Moraine acts as a barrier to smog blowing north from Toronto, a York Region health department official predicts.

Ontario's environment ministry is installing the air monitoring station in Newmarket to measure six key chemicals for the ministry's Air Quality Index.

There are, as yet, no AQI stations in the region, although equipment on Hwy 47 in Stouffville tests for levels of smog-producing ozone and nitrogen dioxide, as well as the suspended particles in air that can harm human health.

The Newmarket station, on the provincial courthouse grounds, will test for these pollutants, plus sulphur dioxide, carbon monoxide and volatile organic compounds.

Oryst Zyhar, York Region's director of health protection, said the results will give the ministry a much better grasp of air quality here, especially in areas north of the elevated moraine, which runs through King Township, Richmond Hill and Stouffville.

"We don't know what the effect is (on the air) north of the ridges, but we will," Zyhar said last week.

Until now, the region's medical officer of health, Dr. Helena Jaczek, had to issue smog alerts based on readings from the AQI stations in North York and Scarborough.

There are 27 AQI stations monitoring air across Southern Ontario. High numbers on the index, which runs from zero to 100, indicate poor-quality air. Smog alerts are issued whenever the index climbs above 50.

On smoggy summer days, airborne pollutants from Toronto and the U.S. often come north into the region, blown away from Lake Ontario. Although Vaughan, Richmond Hill and Markham are thought to share the same air patterns as Toronto, municipalities to the north may not.

The self-contained and self-powered AQI station, hidden behind a high privacy fence, will be housed in a very small and unimpressive building.
