Cameras invade privacy: students

trustees at a board meeting later this month.

Dave Martin, manager of student transportation services for the boards, said cameras will catch kids who rise from their seats. But he also echoed Beckley's comment that vandalism will be difficult to catch.

"We are skeptical that it's going to be effective," he said. "We're not sure the camera even covers everyone on the bus so that's why we're going through a trial period."

Martin said officials feel the cameras do not unduly invade students' privacy.

"It's no greater invasion than that at high schools. Most of them have cameras now," he said, also comparing the situation to cameras that monitor people at bank machines.

Officials cannot use information caught on camera for any reasons other than those involving security, he added.

King City's Langdons Coach Lines Company will help put up the estimated $1,100 for the pilot project.

President Geoff Galway said he couldn't estimate how much money his company has lost through students ripping and cutting bus seats.

He admitted the cameras may not catch a student vandalizing a seat, but they can provide a record of where each student is sitting on a given bus ride, he noted. Officials can then use the information to pinpoint vandals after drivers have checked buses after a ride.

Administrators are to give the board feedback on the project and officials are to evaluate it at least three times throughout the school year.

The boards are to make a final decision on the matter by October 2001.
