

New Toyota Camry Solara convertible unveiled by Toyota

"Wanna drop the top for a picture?" a voice piped up from the back seat.

As we slip-slid along the road, I blinked through the Solara's windshield at the foot or so of fresh snow that had fallen overnight. Another load of the white stuff seemed to be blowing sideways, the morning after. We were in a convertible. The car was dirty with splashes of brown slush splattered along the sides and fenders.

"These Toyota tekies are a coupl'a loons" I thought to myself.

Yup. Definitely my kind of guys.

"Sure," I answered aloud. "Let's do it."

So, we found a spot near the Toronto

Windsurfing Club down by Cherry Beach. Where I took pictures and worried about shooting a white car against all that white snow and exactly how much of that falling snow was falling into the soft tan leather interior of a prototype that might be appearing at the Toronto Auto Show in the next few days. The Toyota guys just stood there in boots and parkas, grinning like kids on a snow day, enjoying the irony of driving convertibles in winter.

And, speaking of irony, "Isn't it kind of ironic," I asked later, "building a California car like the Solara convertible up here in cold, cold Canada?"

After all, only about five percent of the Solara convertibles manufactured at the Toyota Motor Manufacturing Canada plant (TMMC) will stay in this country. The bulk of the up to 50,000 or so vehicles are sun-belt destined to be sold in warmer climes.

"No, that's not ironic," David Stone, Toyota Canada's PR poobah, told me. "That's actually a Canadian manufacturing success story."

The TMMC plant in Cambridge is the exclusive production site for the Solara, a made-for-North America convertible. The facility employs over 2700 people and is a three-time winner of the J.D. Power Gold Plant Award for Initial Quality. The 2.8 million sq. ft. facility also produces Toyota Corollas and Camry/Solara coupes and has a combined capacity of 200,000 units per year.

Part of this success story is built on an evolution of product that started with the debut of the California-designed Toyota Solara Concept convertible, first shown at the Chicago Auto Show three years ago.

Convertibles are a nice show piece but they don't sell in big numbers, so the design was refined into a production hardtop that went on sale about a year ago as part of the Camry lineup. Even the Camry Solara coupe was a bit of a gamble what with the current truck and sport utility craze. But fads come and go and Toyota's hopes were pinned on a generation of empty nesters who, freed from their minivan obligations or just plain tired of trucks, might turn back to smaller, sportier modes of transportation.

The Camry Solara coupe gamble paid off in respectable sales numbers but Toyota had not forgotten the original excitement of the Solara convertible concept.

So now we have, strikingly true to the original concept, the 2000 Solara convertible - a reality at last," said Tony Wearing, Toyota Canada's VP of sales.

The all-new Solara convertible is a joint venture between TMMC and ASC (American Sunroof Company) which opened a production facility near the Toyota plant in Cambridge.

Production of the Solara convertible goes through several different stages. A coupe body shell will be built at TMMC, then shipped to ASC for removal of the roof and convertible-specific reinforcement. The body is then returned to TMMC for painting and interior fitting. Then, it's back to ASC for interior trim, quarter windows, convertible installation and final detail work. Final inspection and quality testing takes place at TMMC before delivery.

That seems like a lot of bouncing around, back and forth between the two plants.

But, as Don McFalls, vice president of quality at TMMC told me, "It's worth it if the extra steps combine Toyota product quality with the driving fun and lifestyle of a convertible."

The Toyota Camry Solara convertible is powered by a 3.0L 200 hp V6 engine mated to a standard 4-speed, electronically-controlled automatic transmission. Estimated combined city/highway fuel rating is 10.6L/100 km.

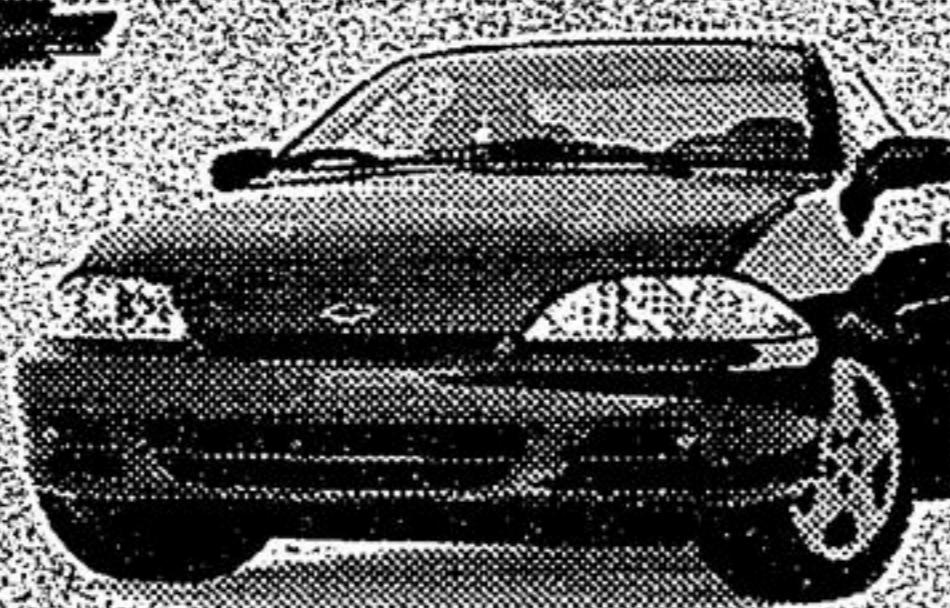

The new convertible rides on a 4-wheel independent MacPherson struts bolstered by front and rear stabilizer bars, anti-vibration sub-frames and gas-filled shocks. For sportier handling, an upgrade package with special 16-inch alloy wheels and tires and tighter suspension tuning is available.

Occupant safety features include airbags, driver and front-passenger seatbelt pretensioners and force lim-
