Powering up with cordless tools

Just as portable laptops have given to five years. It takes approximately one hour to recharge a battery, and most tools come with a spare so that a changed battery is always on hand. Popular brands of cordless tools include Canadian Tire's Mastercraft, Sears Craftsman, Black & Decker and the more professional tools of Dewalt and Makita. The Wood Hawk circular saw by Black & Decker is new on the market and a 24-volt saw by Dewalt allows users the versatility of using either a cord or a battery to power the tool. A 10" blade compound miter saw by Delta can cut anything from 2 X4s to small moldings. Users can also make 45 degree and 90 degree cuts. Priced around $200, the miter saw comes with a two-year warranty.

The battery life between recharging is dependent upon various factors including the diameter of screws, the thickness of wood to be cut and even the weather. The colder the temperature, the more power that is needed for a little as $59.

Improvements in rechargeable batteries, however, have enabled portable power tools to tackle larger projects. Voltages are increasing, so that cordless tools can now do bigger jobs.

Taking the memory out of batteries has also improved their performance," says Doug Heming, Associate Dealer at Canadian Tire in Markham. "Previous of $50 to $250 for cordless tools, has batteries had a memory which meant that the battery had to be dead before it could be recharged." With the older batteries, recharging them too soon would change the memory, possibly giving the battery only half of its life.

With so many choices in power tools, it's important to be well informed about products, and to make sure that a tool is suited to the homeowner's cordless tools last for up task.
