

Summitview parents will fight to keep vice principal

Parents and students at Summitview Public School will find out in May if the school will lose its vice principal, a York Region District School Board official says.

The Stouffville school, with a student population of 470, is experiencing declining enrollment. The school will open in September with less students than are in place now.

It's quite possible that the vice principal will not remain, at Summitview, said Joe Allin, associate director of the board.

As a rule, a school with less than 450 students does not have a full-time VP.

"The number 450 is the threshold," said Allin.

There are, however, many factors that could influence the issue. If a school has a high number of young students or has extra programs for children with special needs, exceptions could be made, Allin explained.

"A final decision should be made by May 1," said Allin.

Options that could be considered include having a part-time VP or possibly sharing one with another school, Allin added.

Summitview's VP will not, however, be lost without a fight, vows Jill Bartley, member of Summitview school council.

Parents are appealing to the board to keep a full-time VP in place, suggesting duties linked to the administrative position are critical to the students' education.

"We'll do everything we can to keep our VP," said Bartley.

"The children attending Summitview have gone through too many (administrative) changes in the past three years. This hurts the children."

Council members have decided to approach both the school's superintendent and newly appointed trustee Bob Burrows. "If we don't do something, our VP will be gone in June," said Bartley. Burrows said he just learned of the VP problem in Stouffville. While the school council has not contacted him as yet, Burrows spoke to a Stouffville resident about the issue.

"I'll be reviewing this situation and see what can be done," said Burrows.
