The birds and the trees

Nothing is more irresistible to a bird than the soothing sounds of bubbling of water in a birdbath. In fact, stone birdbaths are common decorative elements in many English-style gardens. Not only do they provide an attractive focal point for the eye, but they can also add a touch of romanticism.

Another equally charming way to attract birds is to plant trees they love. While this option might require a bit more work, the effort is well worth it. If you have ample space, an apple tree is the ideal choice because birds will find a multitude of insects enjoying some juicy apples on and around it. Birch trees are another good choice since they can provide birds with protection and food all year long. Unfortunately, birches do not grow very well in the city, but can thrive in the suburbs or the country.

When selecting a tree keep in mind that once you plant it, it is there to stay. So why not kill two birds with one stone (that's probably not the most appropriate metaphor for this article) and select a species that will not only attract these feathery friends, but will also be an attractive addition to your lawn and your homestead.

If you don't have the space or don't want to add a tree to your lawn, there are many flowers that will attract birds as well. Some of these are Asian poppy, mouse-eared chickweed and myosotis. Trees that attract birds include Crabapple, Nannyberry, certain types of ash, Cherry tree and Saskatoon Berry.
