ban and include exceptions," he said.

Newmarket Councillor Diane Humeniuk, who chaired the task force that drew up the guidelines, said input from a number of sources, including public boards, conservation groups, the lawn care industry and elsewhere, was sought.

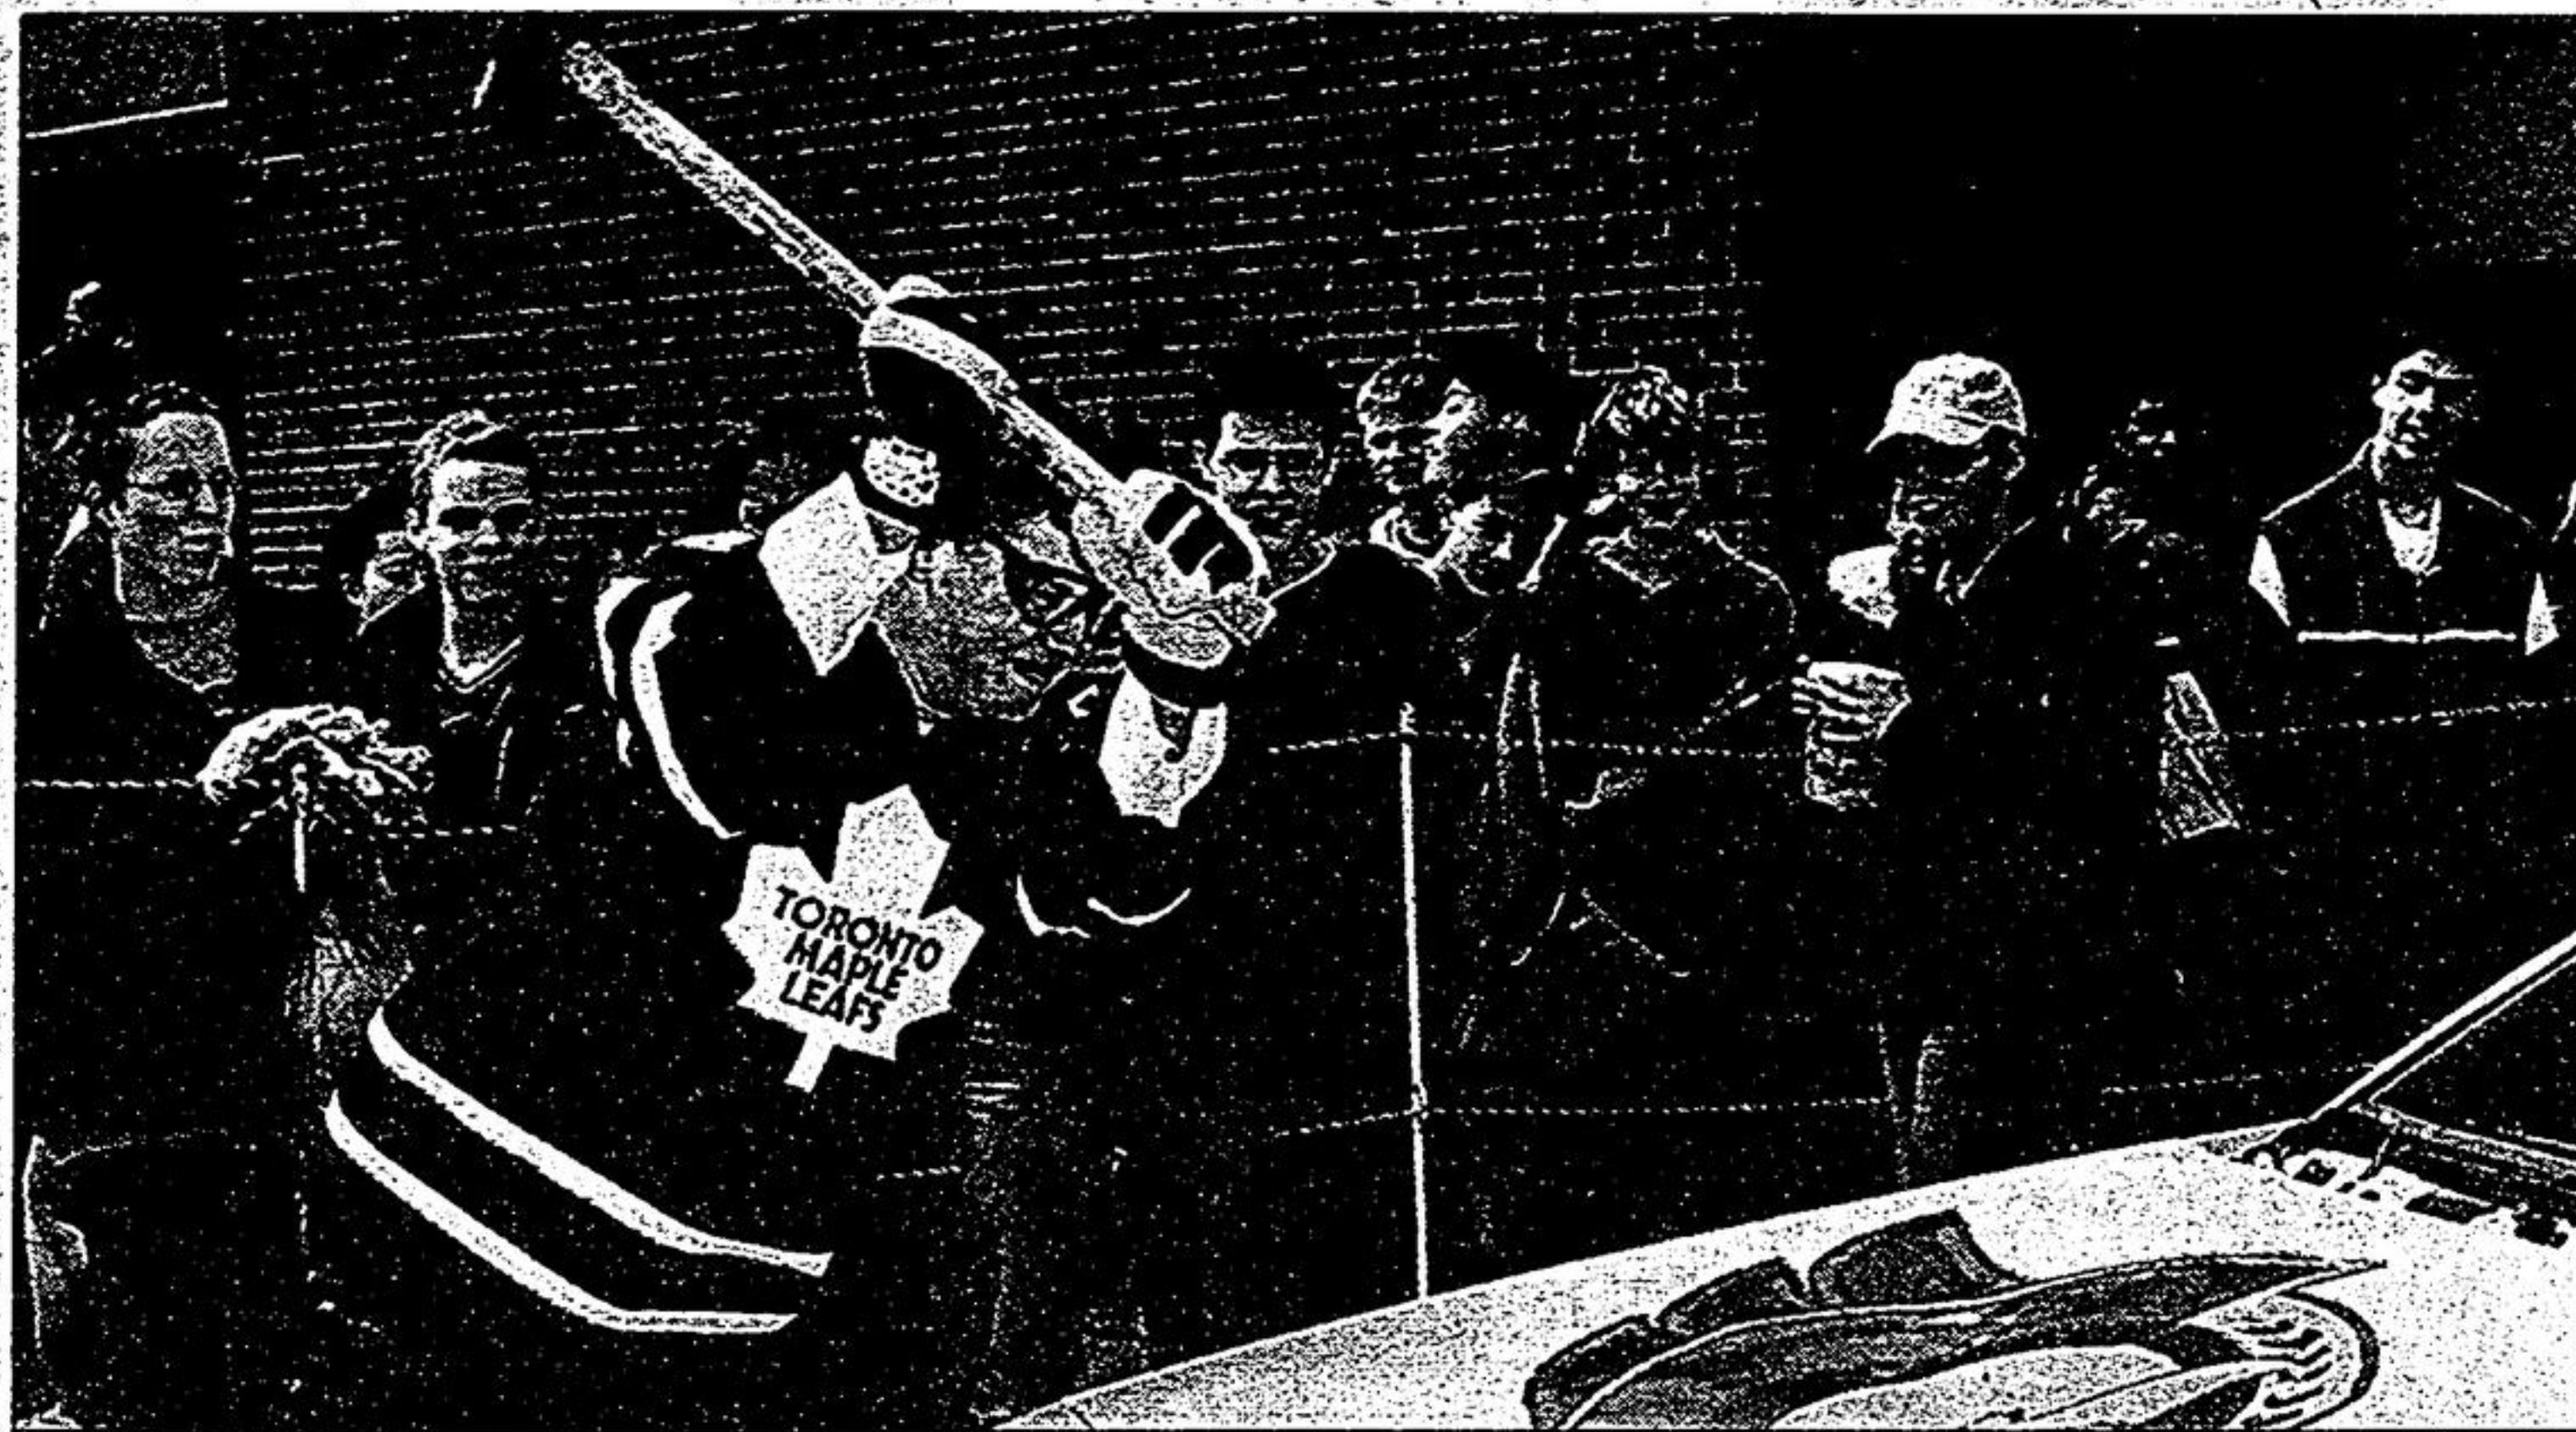

"We've seen a true collaborative effort with all stakeholders," she said. "We ... had people in the industry, whose businesses rely on the use of pesticides."

She called the use of pesticides "a controversial issue". Members of the task force have declined comment on the guidelines, as they haven't seen the finished document yet. The guidelines go to regional council for approval next week.

But already, other municipalities are asking if they can use York's guidelines as a template for their own local policies.

The city of Brockville, for example, has adopted the guidelines.
