

A new way to block the rays

Sunlight is bright and warm and can ruin your vehicle's interior. The sun's rays dry and crack the surfaces causing bits and pieces to literally come apart at the seams. Fortunately, technology has come to the rescue in the form of a window film that uses ceramics as the main ingredient for turning back the sun's harmful ultra-violet rays. Huper Optik, a European-based company with North American operations in Texas, holds the key to cooling things off and keeping out damaging UV light. By using ceramics, Huper's film is clear and won't shrink or discolor over time. Along with offering a nearly 100-per-cent ultraviolet protection for your vehicle's interior, Huper Optik's film also blocks 50-70 per cent of the heat that radiates through the windows. In fact, this coating is used on many high-end German cars in Europe. Huper Optik film is more expensive than more run-of-the-mill dark tints and costs about US $400-$600 for the average vehicle. Inexpensive off-road fun

Thanks to Berrien Buggy you can now build your own 1960s-style dune buggy with fewer hassles than in the 'good old days'. The Nostalgia model is a loose copy of the famous Myers Manx that the world fell in love with back in the late 1960s and early '70s. Berrien's reproduction is made up of three basic components: a jig-welded frame (although you can use an old VW Bug chassis that you have to heavily modify), fiberglass floor section, and a precision-made body with hood and dash. How and where you get the remainder of the parts to finish it off is pretty much up to you, although most will have to come from a donor Beetle. To finish it all off you'll need a drivetrain, steering assembly, seats, windshield, wheels, electrical system and a gas tank. All this, of course, is a far cry from making a dune buggy the old way, which involved finding a VW Bug, removing the body, cutting the floor and mounting a body that in most cases was less than perfect. The Nostalgia body, floor and chassis will run about US $1,900. For a better idea of what you get and what else you'll need, call 1-616-471-1411 or hustle your way over to berrienbuggy.com.

Tireflys light up the night

If you're the type of person who has to be the first on the block with any new gizmo, listen up. Tireflys Pro by Theory3 consists of a screw-on valve-stem cap that actually lights up when your wheels begin to rotate, creating an unusual halo effect at night. Tireflys are made of billet aluminum and have a clear coating for a long-lasting polished look. A built-in 'O'-ring in the threaded area helps keep the batteries (included) dry in all weather conditions. Theory3 says that Tireflys will stay lit for about 200 hours before the batteries need to be replaced (they automatically stop glowing 12 seconds after the wheels stop moving). Tireflys are available in blue, red, white, green, purple and a red/white/blue combo and sell for US $16 each. For more information or a better look, call 1-407-822-8098 or mouse your way to tirefly.com.
