The Passat Wagon is a nice place to be

By Rob Beintema

It's easy to admire the Passat from the inside out. It's a little more difficult figuring out how to physically get from the inside out. I had parked for pictures, taken my camera into the back seat, removed the driver's side head rest from in front of me and started snapping away, taking interior pictures of the steering wheel, instrument panel and dash. When I was finished, I reached for the rear door and nothing happened. Tried the other side with no better luck.

Ah ha, child-proof safety locks. I realized. Adult-proof too, apparently. After moving camera bags, coats and other odds and ends, I managed a contortionist climb over the seatbacks and, with no damage to anything but dignity, slid laughing into the front seat to recover and make a less stressful inspection of the interior. The Passat Wagon is a very nice place to be. There is a wide variety of choice - three engines and four trim levels available, at prices that range from $29,550 up to $54,575.

All Passat Wagons come with a healthy list of standard features that include CFC-free air conditioning, a multi-function trip computer, anti-theft alarm system, cruise control, tilt and telescoping steering, central power locking, power heated mirrors, an 8-speaker AM/FM/CD/Cassette audio system, and, in Canada, a Cold Weather Package featuring heated front seats and heated windshield washer nozzles. This particular tester - a top of the line W8 version - came even more fully loaded with automatic climate control system and heated, 8-way power driver and front passenger seats. The cabin was beautifully finished in dark leather highlighted by chrome on the shifter, shifter plate, hand brake, door releases and steering wheel VW badge. A thin line of chrome also rings the interior, breaking the depth of rich monochrome black. The W8 Wagon follows the earlier introduction of the Passat W8 sedan and, like the sedan, along with the extra frills it also comes with more fundamental upgrades, most notably a revolutionary 8-cylinder engine. The W8 features a 4.0L, 32-valve motor.
