Should You Buy Now. or Wait for Lower Interest Rates?

Reg Taylor

Mortgage Interest rates are going down this year while building costs are continuing to rise. The buyer stands in the middle, How does he decide which is most important?

The computerized answer is that rising costs are more important than high interest rates in making a buying decision.

Let's take a hypothetical example of a 100 percent mortgage of $25,000 at 9 percent for 25 years amortized at $209.80 per month: An interest rate decline of one half of one percent would equal a four percent price increase on the basis of an UNCHANGED MONTHLY PAYMENT. If house prices increase eight percent ($2,000 on $25,000). assuming the same monthly payment, it would take an interest decline of virtually a complete one percent to offset it.

Since construction costs for the last three years have averaged a 714 percent increase yearly, the outlook for home buyers is that buying now is the wisest move since the maximum that interest rates are expected to decline is less than the amount that residential property is expected to increase in price. The comparison makes today's interest rates a bargain.

RURAL PROPERTIES

For too many years rural properties have been penalized by mortgage lenders, creating higher interest rates and lower dollar amounts than financing available on comparable urban properties.

It is acknowledged a slight increase in interest rates for rural properties is perhaps justified, but not to the extent which has existed during the past two to three

To correct this inequity, we have been working closely with many lenders in an endeavour to reduce mortgage interest rates on rural properties and are now pleased to offer the following first mortgage financing for prime rural residential properties:

934% - 5 year term - 25 year amortization
