Queen's Park report

by Donald Deacon, M.P.P.

The recent meeting called by Municipal Affairs Minister, Dalton Bales, presented a clear example of the frustration faced by municipalities in connection with Provincial grants. Although the conditional grants he announced were designed to offset the tax impact of the cumbersome Regional Government imposed on York County last year, the method of granting them showed that Queen's Park intends to assume full control of municipal operations. Locally elected officials are becoming mere intermediaries between the public and Queen's Park. They are being blamed for inefficiencies and higher costs of local government but are deprived of the authority and the resources to make improvements they consider necessary.

The Cause
The trend to big bureaucracy in education and local government began when the public believed this would provide greater uniformity in quality and greater efficiency than the former small units. It sounded sensible to eliminate all the little units of volunteers because so many lacked the

The Democratic Way to Better Government

The way Queen's Park should have brought about the much needed improvement in our old educational and local government structures was to have analyzed the problems. A major problem was the poor system of grants which placed, and still places, the major burden for services for people, including education, on the property taxpayer. This could have been corrected by unconditional provincial per capita grants which by their nature recognize local communities in a democratic society should have the right to decide how to provide for their local needs.

A second major problem was lack of public knowledge about how their local school boards and councils were managing in comparison with others. In my view, the Province should have developed continuing, improved techniques which would inform the public of such important facts.

The third problem was unavailability of expertise provided free of charge to local authorities when the latter so requested. If experts were made available in this way they would be serving local people rather than making decisions for them and local elected representatives would still be responsible for the performance achieved by local government. The public would then be in a position to know when improvement, through a change in local representatives, was warranted.

Unfortunately, in education, in assessment, in welfare, in health, and in most other fields of a truly local nature, the people have lost control to the bureaucratic experts. Business tried "the big structure" route a generation or more ago, however, successful modern businesses have since learned the value of local interest and autonomy in winning the support of the public. It is time Queen's Park learned the same.
