'Last agricultural building in Stouffville'

and that is the last tie to it.

"It is the last agricultural building in Stouffville," he said.

The Heritage Advisory Committee report will be used to formulate the staff report on GO Transit's demolition permit request, which will come back to council in about a month.

No one from GO Transit spoke at the meeting. A spokesperson confirmed yesterday a permit application had been submitted.

This isn't the first time GO has made moves to demolish the building.

Schell Lumber bought the Stouffville Co-op on Edward Street in 2004, but didn't take over the grain elevator, which had sat unused for several years. At that time, GO took ownership of the land near the co-op, where the grain elevator is located.

The building was slated to be demolished in June of 2004 as part of an expansion plan by GO Transit to make more room for commuter parking.

In the meantime, the town's Heritage Advisory Committee met with GO to work out other options, since the grain elevator was on the town's heritage inventory list.

The building was then given a reprieve, with GO agreeing to leave the building intact for the time being. Local politicians, however, did give their approval for GO to take down the single-storey portion of the building, which was added after the original grain elevator was built, and the adjacent Quonset hut.
