York police want to put you on list

System lets you know of crimes, emergencies

BY AMANDA PERSICO
Staff Writer

York Regional Police want to notify you if there is a break-in or vandalism in your neighbourhood.

While no news is good news, so far, not many residents care to find out, if the police's alert system is any indication.

A few years ago, York police introduced a community alert program, where local residents are informed via e-mail about emergency situations in their neighbourhoods.

Now, the police are in the process of building its residential and commercial database.

But the numbers on the notify list are remarkably low.

"We have the database," said Inspector Heidi Schellhorn. "But we don't have anyone to notify."

There are only a few thousand residents signed up to the service out of a population of almost 900,000 in York Region.

The community alert program notifies residents within a certain geographic area.

Alerts are sent for such events as break and enters, vandalism, car thefts, flooding and missing persons. The information gathered will not be used for other purposes because of privacy issues, Insp. Schellhorn said.

The community alert program is connected to the police's mapping system, using postal codes and geographic co-ordinates to send out the message.

"The system is adaptable to our needs," she said. "It's like noxious fumes, we can fan it out anywhere to get the message out."

Some residents already signed up said they haven't received any alerts from police.

"No news is good news," Insp. Schellhorn said. "We only send out an alert when things are critical."
