Garden paths: inviting and practical

Garden paths are a prime way to set the tone of a garden. They invite guests to explore, and they encourage their hard-working owners to revisit the fruits of their labour. And practically speaking, paths often make it easier to move between the home, outdoor pool, vegetable garden, and garden gates. Not to mention that they facilitate the pushing about of wheelbarrows full of plants or soil.

Before you decide on the width of a centrally located footpath, consider its practical applications. The width of a path depends on the traffic: a 1.5 metre-wide path is comfortable going for two people, walking side by side. Too many home owners have difficulty getting into the backyard to cut the grass simply because the path through the gate is too narrow! Other, more whimsical paths, are meant to draw people into the depths of the garden, so they can be winding and narrower than the main access routes.

Do-it-yourselfers have a wide range of materials to choose from. Select what best suits the style you want and the path's intended use. If your path is on a slope, avoid small pebbles that will scabble downhill as people walk on it. Slabs of natural stone are highly recommended for all garden paths, as they preserve the natural allure of a garden. Once the stones are in place, you can plant ground cover around them to increase their natural beauty.

Paths are an important feature of any garden, but their practicality has to be considered.
