"Eight Years Have Passed"

*Sometimes I am sure I can hear her,
In the rustle of the leaves,
Or in the creak of the floorboards,
Her voice drifting on the wind,
And through the house
that was once a home.
But time and again I am reminded,
The past holds memories to which the present can never relate.
Even the brightest flame gives off the palest heat,
When the distance is so great.*

*Her voice, once so full and vibrant,
Now the faintest whisper in my ear.
Her warm embrace, once the most calming remedy,
Now fails to soothe my dull aching bones.*

*But through it all I keep thinking, I'll see her face somewhere
Across the room, or through a window,
It does not matter where Just something to tell me she's still present.
Though my mind knows what my heart cannot oblige,
Her soul is no longer with us, nor her body walk the earth.*

*But if ever I were to see her again,
In this lifetime or the next,
I'd ask her just one thing,
"If I wandered the earth
for a hundred years,
Searching for you wherever I went,
Would you still know me, now old,
withered and alone?"*
