The Italians, of course, exploin their defeat by the presence of French and Russian officers with Menelek, but it may be questioned if any Anglo Indian General accustomed to mountain warfare would agree with them. Drill does not improve Oriental soldiers like the Abyssinians They are Semites in blood, ot exceptional courage, men centre of Italian regiments: they have | ment only. Genenerals accustomed to utilize masses of men who recently destroyed an army from Khartoum at Kassala. They had good rifles, they were on the higher ridges when they started, and their king, Menelek, is obviously a soldier of the Hyder Ali type-that is, a man who can induce his soldiery to die. To beat such men they must either be decoyed out of the hills or attacked from above, and the Italians were still mounting when a kind of avalanche of riflemen swept down on them. The number of dead suggests that the Italians fought well, but the trightful proportion of officers killed, two thirds of the whole number, tells a different tale. The officers, we fear which may, however, have broken out at first only among the native
