December, with a frenzy of festive celebrations will soon be here, but first comes the sadness of Remembrance Day on November 11.

Earlier in my life there were many World War 1 veterans taking part in the honouring of their fallen comrades. Worldwide, 65,038,810 men and women served in this 'war to end all wars' with 9,750,103 military deaths occurring.

Canada's last living soldier from this war was John Babcock, born in Kingston, Ont., who died on Feb. 18, 2010 at 109. He joined the Canadian Army when he was just 15. He stood 5'4" and weighed just 115 pounds. In 1912 the hourly labourer's wage was 50 cents an hour, so the $1.10 offered by the army would have been very enticing.

At the time of his death in 2010, Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper called Babcock "the last living link" to a war "which in so many ways marked our coming of age as a nation."

The last living veteran of World War I was Florence Green of England, who died Feb. 4, 2012 at 110. The last combat veteran who served in the and died May 5, 2008 was Harry Patch, a veteran who served who died July 25, 2008 last Central Power Kuster of Austria May 27, 2008 aged 104. More than 65 years now they are all gone of the war and the remain.
