Black Bart, the boldest and most notorious highwayman ever known in California, is operating again. The five robberies of stage and coach on lonely mountain roads in northern California and southern Arizona during the last few months have abundant earmarks of the famous lone highwayman of the Sierras. More than this, two of the passengers in the held-up stages knew something of the Black Bart when he held central California in terror twenty years ago, and, from his speech and figure, are sure that their robber is the noted bandit. Moreover, no one seems know what has become of him since his release from prison at San Quentin. where he had been sentenced for eight

For seventeen years highway robberies by Bart's capture before, but that the Black Bart bad taken place at intervals and in least expected localities. all the way from Portland, Ore.,

His arrest came about in this way In March, 1884, the stage coach that travelled the rough road over the desolate hills and through the lonely gulches from a gold mining camp in the Sierras to Marysville, Cal., was held up by a masked lone highway man, whom the driver and all th passengers recognized by his manners and speech as none other than Black Bart. The veteran highwayman had reduced his mode of robbery to a science, and when he had quickly harvested a crop of gold watches, purses end bits of jewelery, he shouted to the driver to go ahead. When the coach had rumbled out o sight on the way down the mountain side Black Bart turned his attention to splitting open the wooden box containing the Wells-Fargo express company's treasure.
