In conversation with a journalist, who did not quite share her opinion on the subject, she declared it was deeply humi lating for a woman to have, on her wedding day, to become so completely the property of her husband as to forget her own origin. By the present order of things a wife was constrained to forget her ancestors, though to honor them was admittedly a virtue and a duty. Though the meeting was nearly unanimous in favor of a married woman continuing to bear her own family name after marriage, even the supporters of this "teform" could not agree as to the name to be borne by the children Some supported the idea of giving the name of both the father and mother to the offspring.
