> Anecdote Of Wellington. Capt. W. Gordon McCabe, of ginia, in his personal recollections of Tennyson in the March Century, relat's that the faureate said to him, referring to the lines in the ode : 'I never saw the duke but once; that was in St. James' park as be rode out of the Horse Guards, I lifted my hat, and he saluted me in quick mil tary fashion. Once at Bath House, where I was for a little while at some sort of entertainment, Monckton Milnes wanted me to stay and be preon later. But I said, what the devil do you suppose the duke wants to see me for?' and went away. That minds me." he continued with a chuckle, "When the duke was a very old man, president of the privy council, he had walked up one day from Downing street, instead of riding, as he usually did. He walked up the lefthand side of Piccadilly, along St James and the Green park, and when he came to a point opposite Apsley house, the old soldier couldn't cross the street safely owing to the number of carriages and hansoms that were whirling past. At last a well-dressed man recognized the duke in the crowd, and divining his trouble, went up to him and sail, Will your grace, allow me the bonor of escorting you across the road?' Thanks, said the old hero, laconically. This was safely ac complished, and Thanks, said duke again. But the patriotic Briton standing uncovered, said : My lor duke, this is the proudest moment of my life. I shall tell my children, and they shall tell their children, that one had the distinguished honor Waterloo. The old duke, with his aristocratic beak and military whisk er, glancing down at his effusive friend with his eagle glance, said dry ly, 'Now, don't make a d-d fool of yourself, and forthwith vanished." A Story Of Wolseley. Troop-Sergt. Scott, an Englishma has come to Canada after having
