He not professing to be a philanthropist He does not claim that his action suggested by any special bearing of his religious experience. He simply has a tender heart and one which can be moved to generous deeds. His action is a severe rebuke to the christianity of the day, which is strangely lacking sometimes in the elements of self-sacrifice. To be a christian is to take i the life and character of the Master and to imitate Him, as far as pos sible, in the routine and conduct every day life. The early disciples left the record of what they did when they became - christians. They had If things in common. They cared for the weak and the needy. They made sacrifices of everything, even the sac rifice of themselves. The later dis ciples do not give until they feel it They do not give their all. They not give enough in some cases to miss it. And Mr. Keene comes along to demonstrate, by his act, that th greatest help comes at times from the gift should make the church realize that it represents more than a name and a sentiment.
