These days brought forth a succession of surprises. At the third reading of the prohibition bill the opposition started out vigorously, almost jauntily, to attack the government position. Mr. Crawford's amendment was supported by his colleagues in a solid body, save Mr. Marter, who would not vote the referendum out because he wanted a test of publi opinion, though under lavored circumstances. The majority against the amendment was thirteen. Then Mr. Marter declared he had several amendments, but having no seconder could not proceed. This was an announcement very pleasing to the conservatives and quite agreeable to the liberals alos. But Mr. Dempsey, of Prince Edward county, came chivalrously to the rescue, in accordance with a pledge several days old, and seconded the motions. His political associates urged him to withdraw his name, but as he was adamantine his name was Dennis, if the mutterings along the benches could be understood from the galleries by students of lip language. The opposition policy was suddenly demoralized; members were put up to speak against time, that a division might be iman unescapable adjournment to attend Mrs. Ross' funeral.
