Mr. Ross' rise and success is, therefore, the legitimate result of active, honest, and ambitious service. He is a rare one who does not profit by devotion to duty. In every sphere of life there is a chance for promotion, and usually the one who is faithful and industrious makes his mark. Men sometimes fail to get their reward. for all employers are not discriminat ing, and not gifted in their appreciation of employees. But fidelity and usefulness generally win notice or four sooner or later. Few men have risen in any service except upon their merits. Those, who, by accident or deception, climb to places of responsi bility, have their own anxieties, while those who have done well in lower po sitions carry themselves creditably and show that the training in the one has made the qualification for the other.
