LOST ARM, SAVED HIS LIFE. Terrible Experience of a Man Who

Fell as He Leit the Train. La Crosse, Wis., Chroniele, Oscar Wensole, who was recently seriously injured by a Burlington train, is rapidly improving at St. Francis' hospital. The story of the accident, as told by the injured young man, is that he attempted to jump, intending to alight upon his left foot He slipped, and was forced to extend his right foot, which when it struck the ground threw him directly, toward the train. In attempting to catch at something, his arm fell across the rail, and his position was such that it was impossible for him to move without meeting instant death. Thus, with the full realization of what was transpiring, he was forced to lie perfectly still and endure having reight sets of wheels pass over and grind off his arm. Besides the first pinching sensation, there was no great pain. If he had attempted to move out of the way he would have been crushed upon the head by the overhanging steps of the coaches as they rushed over him, or, possibly, thrown under

It was all done so quickly that there was but a fraction of a second to decide between the loss of an arm and the retention of life and an attempt to save the arm and probably death. He chose the former. In dim way he saw a receding light and faintly realized what it all meant; that the train was gone and that be no longer possessed a right arm. He struggled upon the elbow of his remaining arm and managed to reach
