NATION CEREMONIES The Procession-The King's Herb-Woman, Who Scatters Flowers Many Other Interesting Relics.

The coronation has been fruitful induring the course of its long history, in the number of quaint, oldworld features which it presents for our notice. Unfortunately, not a few of them are at this moment in what is, at any rate, temporary abeyance, owing to the fact that the powers that be seem of late years to be bent on restricting the ceremony within the smallest possible limits, thus following the unfortunate precedent set by king

Look, for instance, at that most delightful custom-the coronation procession from Westminster hall, through New Palace yard, and right round to the western doors of the Abbey church. All along the route of the procession a raised platform crected, railed in on either side and covered with blue cloth, which tended from the steps of the throne in Westminster hall to the grand "theatre' beneath the lantern in the ab bey. All this is entirely gone.

It is, of course, impossible to give a full account of the procession, which was of an exceedingly elaborate de scription; but we can notice a few of its more important features. The first group, walking immediately behind the dean's beadle of Westminster, consisted of the king's herb-woman and her train of assistants, who, clad in gorgeous satire, proceeded to scat ter their | eautiful blossoms at the head of the procession, as it passed duties were carried out was at the coronation of George IV, when the chief officient was Miss Fellowes, sister to the secretary of the lord great chamberlgin, to whom the bonor had peen promised before the king had actually come to the throne.

The barons of the Cinque ports also had a quaint duty to perform, the right thus to officiate having been granted them as far back as reign of John. They were entitled to carry a canopy over the heads of the royal pair during the procession to the abbey. In return for this service, the gallant barons received the canopy which was composed of cloth of gold, together with the staves which supported it and the silver bell at each corner. The barons were supplied from the towns of Hastings, Dover, Hythe, Rye, Sandwich, Romney and Winchelsen, all of them being arrayed in garments of which crimson sating was the prevailing feature. At their appearance, e.g., at the coronation of George IV, they provoked no little merriment by their generally ungainly movements; indeed, when the moment arrived to start for the abbey, the canopy, and insisted upon walking a few paces in front. One of the most picturesque features in the coronation was the performance of the service due from the important potentate who at one time exercised rights, virtually amounting to kingship, over the Isle of Man. The service to be rendered consisted in bringplaint of the Leadville board | ing two falcons on the coronation day rado Midland and a large number of evoked at George IV's, coronation, other western roads. also termed, made its appearance at coronation after coronation, but we magine that the majority of our English sovereigns must have preferred to follow the example set them by Charles II., who "accepted the service but did not eat the pottage. Ever since the coronation of James II., these young gentlemen had had a prominent and interesting part to fulfil-due to the fact, no doubt, that, just like dean, canons, minor canons, and choristers, they occupy a distinct place upon the ancient Blizabethan foundation of Westminster abbey. It a fact not generally realized that in reality. Westminster abbey ceased to be an abbey shortly after the accession of queen Elizabeth. It then refounded as the collegiate church of St. Peter at Westminster, though the ancient title has always retained its hold upon the affections of English people. Of this collegiate foundation, then, the king's scholars form part; and at the coronation they have to cheer the king and queen in a dead language, i.e., Latin. It must produce a weird effect when the shrill treble voices of the boys ring out against the roof in the words, "Vivat rex Edwardus; vivat Regina Alexandra !" as their majesties pass through the choir of the abbey. The king scholars first of all appeared, or, rather their appearance is for the first time definitely recorded at the coronation of James 11.; while the remaining members of the school, described as the town boys, were seen at the ceremony first of all at George IV's, coronation.

Twice over does the sovereign make his solemn offering at the high altar of the abbey. The first occasion takes place immediately after the act of rement of the service. This first oblation consists of a pall of cloth of gold, with an ingot or solid wedge of gold, both of which are delivered to the king by the lord great chamberlain, and are then laid by his majesty on the high altar.

The second oblation occurs later on at the time of the offertory in the communion service. It consists of another wedge, known as the mark of gold, which weighs some eight ounces, It is received by the archbishop into the dish, and placed upon the altar. At one time these various oblations became the property of the dean and chapter of Westminster abbey; but for a long time past they have been commuted for a money payment.

This is a particularly interesting feature of the service. Curiously enough, it is said, or more properly sung, by two bishops vested in copes, who kneel side by side at a faldstool placed immediately in front of the 'theatre." This custom finds counterpart in a certain sense at Lincoln Minster, where the litany is regularly sung by two of the lay members of the choir.

This weapon is always considered to be the personal property of the sovereign, which form part of the actual regalia of England. After the archbishop has laid it upon the alter and duly blessed it, the sword of state is girt about the king, and attached to his girdle by the lord great chamberlain. It does not remain up on the royal person, however, for any great length of time, for it is ungirded and offered by the king in its scabbard. Immediately after, however, it is redeemed, by commandment of the king, for the sum of one hundred shilings; after which it is carried naked n front of his majesty by the nobleman who thus redeems it.

The various ceremonies of anointing. investing, and crowning of the king having been performed in their accus-tomed order, it is the privilege of the lord of the manor of Worksop first of all to present him with a rich scarlet glove, a token of dignity. For the remainder of the ceremony this nobleman stands at the king's right hand, and either supports his arm or holds his sceptre, as occasion may require, The present lord of the manor of Worksop is his his grace the duke of Frightful Case of Exhausted the coronation medals is one which will hardly fine favour with our modern ideas. They used to be distributed during the performance of the homage by the treasurer of the king's household, who, attended by Black Rod and Garter king at arms, used to fling them among the people from the north, south, and west sides of the "theatre." The supreme test of a good advertisement is, of course, its selling power, and to this end it must first attract the attention of re the reader, then its matter must be such as to impire the reader with a desire for use the article. It must be moderate, truthful, convincing, and appeal to the reason as well as to the curiosity of the reader. Many of the contestants seem to have lost sight of these facts entirely. In many of the advertisements there was an attempt at being smart, which detracted
