Of all our English sovereigns, John, it may fairly be said, surpassed alike his predecessors and successors, in the disgusting exhibition of irreverence his coronation. As was the case at a more recent coronation, more magnificent, but fully as unfortunate as that of John, the sovereign declined to receive the holy communion. All the way through the service, too, did the king allow himself to be convul-sed with laughter. This laughter brought about one singularly unfor-tunate event. At that time the duchy of Normandy was part and parcel, so to speak, of the English crown. Consequently, it was a part of the order
