SPOKE HIS GRATITUDE.

The telegram which Lieut.-Col. Pellett sent from Southampton, on the eve of their departure from England, expressive of the Canadian contingent's thanks for all the kindness it had been accorded, reads strangely. Why? It had been generally understood that these men were sorely disappointed with the manner in which they had been treated. They were not quartered as they desired. They were not at all conspicuous. They got wet. In Canada, during the camp season, they would not mind a soaking, but in London, and in connection with the king's coronation, they did not look for this.

Considered closely the plans for the care of our men were about as good as the circumstances would permit. The contingent was not to be on exhibition all the while, but it was duly recognized. Some men were given posts of honor. All of them had as good treatment as Tommy Atkins, who is the ideal soldier and the pride of the nation.

Let us hope that the Canadians will get over soon the seeming slight that was put upon them. They visited London when it was under pressure. They did not get just what they expected, but in a great jam, on a great occasion, they got the best that was going, and they ought to be satisfied. Their commandant, in his farewell words, practically apologizes for the rash things that were said without much provocation.

WHAT IS THE CHANGE?

The Toronto Telegram is out as the advocate of popular representation. It refers to Quebec and contends that it has a larger representation in parliament than its population warrants. "Quebec's system of electoral divisions is not intentionally a gerrymander. In effect the Quebec system is the worst gerrymander in history," says the Telegram. It is the product of a government which embraced a number of heaven-born conservative statesmen. What does our contemporary recommend? Is there a remedy, and what is it? The pessimist—the fellow who is forever dissatisfied and disgruntled, who is forever seeing things going wrong and making no effort to right them—is not the ideal citizen.

The Telegram is impressed with the fact that the Ross government for the time being does not represent the popular vote in Ontario. This, it alleges, is being treated as an unimportant incident. Is it? Is the Brantford Expositor, as alleged, laughing at the disfigurement of the tories? It is not justified in calling attention to an historical fact, that the electoral system has produced before what is regarded as an anomaly now? The tory government has had the advantage of representation which was not according to the popular vote, and it was all right because a tory government ruled. That was an important incident to which attention can, very fittingly, be called.

If the people are to be represented in a popular way—if the majorities in the provinces rather than the majorities by counties and electoral divisions are to be represented in parliament—there will have to be a change in the manner of electing members. Proportional representation has been suggested as a solution for the problem? What does the Telegram propose? It is easy to find fault. It is not so easy to conceive and commend.

The right to use a person's picture in a public advertisement has been tested in Rochester, and disposed of in a remarkable way.

A young lady was surprised to find that her photograph had been procured, surreptitiously, lithographed and printed upon 25,000 placards which a flourishing establishment posted up. The picture was the attraction, and it brought the complainant worry and illness, for which she sought compensation to the value of $15,000.

The money would not soothe her feelings, but the success of her suit would somewhat relieve her of the scandal of publication, and put a check upon the offences of cheeky persons. In the first court she won the case. She was granted damages, but not the amount claimed. The court of appeal, however, has reversed the decision of the lower court. In effect it has ruled—this court of eleven judges—that there is no substantial ground for the suit.

The court did not take any stock in the contention that one cannot go through the world as he will, without notice, without comment, without the notoriety which pictures and prints may give him, and that there cannot be an invasion of privacy. It is as if the young woman pleaded, but it did hold that if actions such as this prevailed there would be a lot of litigation having effects which would "do violence to settled principles of law by which the public and the profession have long been guided."

Such a conclusion is directly contrary to common sense. The publication of pictures, some of them in strange connections, has occasioned comment, but the publications have usually followed the consent of the parties affected. The publication without consent—in the face of the vigorous protests and expressed disapprovals—is simply an outrage which should not be tolerated on any account.

CAUSES OF FAILURE.

It is the practice with the leading educational institutions to have the students addressed by men of prominence and experience. The speaker of distinction this year at the University of Chicago was Bishop Spalding, of Peoria.

The bishop is a man of affairs. He does not apply his attention wholly to church history and ecclesiastical law. He enquires into everything which concerns the people, and so he caused no surprise, when asked to lecture before the college, by discussing the causes of success and failure. "Seven-tenths of the failures recorded in Bradstreet's last year," said he, "were due to moral faults, chief of which was incompetence, and only three-tenths to causes over which the individual has no control."

In other words men have been engaged in pursuits for which they have had no qualification, and no tastes and no liking, or they have been unskillful in business, and by their neglect have brought on bankruptcy.

"Success is in ourselves, not in what we possess," said the good bishop, and he added, apparently with the mental picture of ruin by inheritance before him: "Too many young men are left with millions, which drag them down into the slough of animal life." Money at the beginning of life, lots of it, robs men of the ambition which makes them put their talents to some account. It is the desire for a competence that makes men work in their early life, and work hard, with varying effects. When that competency is reached the ambition cannot be quenched. Then, rightly constituted, men should become genuinely unselfish and public benefactors.

The remark of a wealthy citizen, in this community, cannot be forgotten. He said he used to take pleasure in making money, and made it quietly. "Now," he observed, "that pleasure is gone." Why? He had enough for his own needs. He could help others, and he had done so. But he had been impressed, like Bishop Spalding, by the incompetence of the masses, and by their indisposition to use their opportunities, their time, their talents.

The constant check which philanthropy is receiving comes from the idleness, the indifference, the ingratitude of the people. They do not recognize, as Bishop Spalding has pointed out, that success is in themselves, and that failure, when not due to circumstances over which they have no control, is due to their incompetence, and that it may arise from want of knowledge, of energy, and devotion.

EDITORIAL BRIEFS.

The Spectator is very guileless. Is everything which the independent press has said about it correct?

The coalition yarn is referred to as treason by the liberals and impudence by the tories. It has been happily labelled.

It is proposed to teach French and German, orally, in the public schools of Toronto. There is not enough in the curriculum now.

Mr. Hughes, school inspector, Toronto, has been going a good many times, but he is not gone yet. Has he been playing a game of bluff?

Rev. Mr. Harvey is imitating Mr. Sheldon, of Kansas fame, and is reading from the pulpit successive chapters of a book he is about to publish. That is one way, the cheap way, of advertising a book.

Capt. Morrison, of the coronation contingent, writing from England to the Ottawa Citizen, describes the accommodations of the troops as quite comfortable. Some of our boys—the grumblers—have been expecting too much.

The Halifax Recorder has come to the conclusion that "some tory alleged voter has been—well, twisting the lower limbs of the tory candidate up in North Grey." Or twisting his conscience and the pencil in the polling booth.

Mr. Morgan, of merging fame, being dined, some time ago, with the king of England, and lately with the emperor of Germany, an American print suggests that he may undertake to syndicate the kingdoms. Oh, no. There are some things he cannot do.

The Ottawa Journal hints that the day is not far off when the wealthy will have to divide up with the poor, "by the decision of the majority." It is moved to say this by reflections on the king's dinner to half a million people. Is the day of social democracy at hand?
