I used to be satisfied to fishing off Cataraqui bridge or wit such amateurs as Charlie Corbett and T. Mck. Robertson, up around the Brothers', with my angling outfit that The production of anthracite goal in 1900 cost me less than one dollar, and dollars, I am almost ashamed to confess that I ever angled when my catch cost me not more than fifty cents a friend, the captain, would have me go The directors of the Kingston Fair picturing visions of seven pound bass to understand that it is an unwritten law among professional gentlemen anglers never to be on time; I have made a mental note of this and many other facts. Well, simultaneously with their arrival came a grocer's rig; bearing four cases of bait manufactured by the Toronto Brewing company, half a case of bait manufactured by Joe Seagram, and used for catching , the larger fish that always get away; also square black bottles and manufactured in the land over which Queen Wilhelmina rules. I never went out on a fishing expedition be fore where we had more than one quart bottle of bait, and we seldom had occasion to use that much, but in these strenuous days one needs to be well fortified against disastrous emergencies, so my fellow anglers made sure that the trip would not be a failure for want of accessories. forgot to mention that the grocer's rig also brought a pound of cheese and a tin, of soda biscuits, which proved to be more than ample for the run, we arrived at the fishing grounds; had there been any secret about the location of these, we would have divulged it by the trail of corks Many will sincerely sympathize with we left in our wake and which would Mr. and Mrs. James Leslie, 265 Uni- have served as a guide to the spot. the flashy gear of my companions, I felt like an unrepentent sinner, who had got into a strange church and entered the wrong pew. It was agreed before we left the steamyacht that we were to pool our catch and then share and share alike. Jack, who was in the skiff with me, was the first to hook a bass; he went about the playing of it like one who had made a close study of the habits and eccentricities of fish, and knew the whole gamut landing them. He felt as proud as the proverpial peacock, when he at last got his eighteen ounce green bass in to the skiff; I am certain he pitied me with my cheap outfit, and only the fear that I might take offence kept him from offering to lend me his costly one to catch a fish with. As he was making a cast, I hooked a big fel low and after a little play, during which I wholly ignored the directions shouted to me by my expert companion, I landed him; he weighed a few ounces, over four pounds. Jack took credit for landing the fish, saving that had I not followed his advice, the fish would certainly have escaped. "Some minutes elapsed before Jack board: Tickets, 25c.; leaves, 8 p.m. hooked another one, and meanwhle had brought up three more. Of a sudden Jack exclaimed confidently, 'Ha, I've got him.' The next instant there was a splash, then Jack's $10 steel rod bent double like a little boy who had eaten too many green apples Snap went something, and Jack held up his rod, which was minus about six inches at the business end; also got away, as he silk line seems to have cut on the edge of the break. I will not attempt a description of Jack's language, but will content myself with saying that if used in parliament it would not be included in the press re-morning to return whence we came, as fishing was 'no good no how. "I have just been making up expenses and find that my two fish, which my companions allowed me, in the generosity of their heart, to bring back cost me & a pound; we gave the engineer the two smaller ones, and divided the eight big fellows among ourselves. The summary of , my experience reads thusly : Four pounds of fish, $12; a red nose, a sore, sunburned neck, half a dozen painful mosquito bites, and a rawflesh spot one hip, caused by lying on a hard uneven bed; not to mention an up

Yesterday Mr. Jones went to a funeral at Evans Mills without telling Miss Turkington, and she, it is said, thinking he had gone to the circus at Clayton with some one else, became despondent. She went down street and greeted her friends last evening in her usual light-hearted manner and met her lover at the boat on his return and spent the evening in his company. It is said that they quarrelled, but in an interview to-day Mr. Jones denied this.

"We parted the best of friends about twelve o'clock," he said; "the reason I did not accompany her to her door being that I had left my hat and coat at my own house. Miss Turkington was naturally gay light-hearted, but has threatened take her life before this."
