They come to a wealthy man's house, and demand a meal. Unless they get it for the asking, they are apt to take possession and carry off the man's whole store of rice. The officials do not interfere with this practice: they scarcely dare to do so, for fear of stirring up serious trouble for themselves. However, we have just heard that the vicerov will presently compelthe rice dealers to sell rice at a reasonable figure-viceroys can do some remarkable things in China-and after rice has fallen in price, then officials will undertake to restore order once more, where now there are disorder and lawlessness.

"I hope nothing will prevent those numerous reinforcements from coming to our help in the fall. I shall write often of the conditions of the country We are led to think that now all will be well yet, although for a time matters seemed serious. They are serious yet, but we trust and hope all will pass over without any general dis turbance in the province. We are all praying for it."
