He was the last to leave the wreck, being washed away when the waters covered the bridge, and afterwards, when standing on some floating wreckage, he ordered the boats about and his coolness resulted in the saving of many lives.

Captain Attwood said, in an interview, that if the steamer's engines had been reversed when he gave the signal the disaster would have been averted. The wreck occurred in a moderate sea during a dense fog. The master was on the bridge, one man on lookout, but the breakers were not observed until the steamer was almost on the high towering rocks seen on the port bow. She bumped softly at first, and then, with an appalling crash, she struck the rocks, and half an hour later the deck was under water. The boats were quickly launched, but be fore the passengers could embark them they were standing waist high i water on the steamer's deck, remain ling there with difficulty. Some of the boats were swamped by the steamer's side, but others managed to get away with good loads. The boats' ropes had Between 1,200 and 1,500 people left been all cut, and before they left the
