> The Duke of Manchester occupies two columns in the Morning Post, in "convincing sentimental imperialistic enthusiasts that free trade is the only possible sound policy." On the other hand an economist who is evidently a high authority argues in over two columns of the Times that any attempt to shirk consideration of the commercial policy of the Empire would create a dangerous situation. Mr. Copeland, the New South Wales agent-general, proposes that after full discussion a national imperial referendum be taken throughout the empire in order to eliminate party polities from the situation. The fact that such an overwhelming majority of English speaking peoples, namely nine ty-four millions adhere to protection against for ty-one millions for free trade entitled their view to some consideration. He adds: "No movement more patriotic or deserving of support ever originated since the Briton ceased to be a painted savage.
