home. He is too well-known. His servants tell neighbors' damaging stories about him. He got into a quarrel with the furnace man, who told about it to the lawn-cutter, or the snow shoveller, and then it leaked out over town. After that the rich man lost his influence and the confidence of the public. The best thing for him would be to go away and start life anew. A new man is always welcome in a community, if he has brain and a few shillings. But he must use his shillings. Here we are like a big vilage. Everybody knows one. Jim starts something. IN REALMS OF FROST.

A Visid Description By An English Banker.

Far off, and away in the frigid de mains of eternal cold, gripped tight in the icy hug of biting, ceaseless frosts, and face to face with a mighty gelid barrier of solid ice, towering high towards the heavy leaden skies, is a valiant band of heroes who, year after year, have been essaying to reach that new object of the explorer's ambition, the South Pole. Through the long, deadly winter plunged day and night in cimmerian darkness; furious bliz zards driving before them a blinding which wind of frozen snow, which smites them as though it were a tempest missiles hurled from some angry volshrouded deep in an ever descending snowy avalanche, every mast, every rope, encased in a thick sheathing o ice, there these brave men while away | New the heavy time in a deadly monotony only broken by ever recurring tempests and whirling hurricanes. And when at length the sun after its long absence once more for a few short minutes rises above the icebound horizon, the outlook is but a dead world, a very wilderness of upreared. banked hummocks and grinding floes, all covered deep by the driven snow; the entire frozen prospect without vestige of life, a grim and deathly striken realm. And then, leaving their wintry home, they start on their sledges, drawn by a score of hardy dogs on a long and dreary journey over the desert snow of their ambition and plant the British flag upon the very southern apex of the world. But, one after the other, animals succumb to the piercing cold and they harnessing themselves in the voke, they drag the heavy sleighs slowand Jaboriously back to the ship; | Wat all happily surviving the melancholy and dismal ice voyage, though frost bitten and nipped to the very bone by the the cruel Antarctic blasts, and be-

Surely one cannot help admiring the form indomitable courage and unfinching Lan perseverance of those hardy explorers, even though after all it may be difficult to understand what material or moral gain will be achieved, even if they do place a cairn over the axis of the globe. But if men would undergo as much hardship and as much privation for the sake of attaining an inheritance in heaven it would be intelligible. Happily, however, it is only the needful to live a godly life, and to $700 claim the atonement of the Redeemer this as sufficient satisfaction to Divine justice. For then that inheritance is absolutely assured.
