THE ADVANTAGES OF MAN-UAL TRAINING.

Article in The Brantford Expositor, By W. S. Ellis, M.A., Principal of Kingston Collegiate Institute.

It is claimed on behalf of manual training work, that it belongs to a group of exercises that are essential to any complete course of study. As a new subject, seeking admission to the high school curriculum, it must make good its claim to recognition by establishing both its educational value and its direct relationship to the community life of the period. The schools have so long been the hunting grounds for self-seeking faddists and unpractical theorists that any proposed change is looked upon with suspicion and questioned as to its right of existence. It therefore is necessary in a discussion of this kind to answer the demands of that legitimate conservatism which calls for particulars before deciding the question at issue. Manual training is educative in its tendencies for three reasons, among others,-It is interestin itself and helps to make other school studies attractive; it leads to the acquisition of knowledge of a useful and entertaining kind, it causes clear thinking and accurate execution, it develops self-reliance and originality, it brings about that attitude of mind which seeks cause and corsequence by investigation rather than by authority, and this is the most work, with the suitable academic sub- ged, and it has been viewed by fully

All knew well the fascination that constructive operations even of a crude kind, have for boys from ten or eleven to fourteen or fifearly experiences of power over the world of matter. If the educational doctrine, widely held, be at all true, that the individual epitomizes in his early years the great period of devel opment through which the race has passed, then the constructive tendency onio of boyhood and youth sums the long ages of human growth that connect shop operative. This the race has gone through in reaching its present civilization, this the boy should pass through in coming to his place in that civilization. Hence if there be any real foundation for the theory of the similarity of development of the man and his kind the neglect to use this aptitude of pupils for constructive work,
