> One Of The Bonapartes. On January 7th, 1767, Joseph Bonaparte, eldest brother of Napoleon, king of Naples, and Spain, was born at Corti, Corsica; died in England, 1844. Joseph's reign in Spain from 1808 to 1813, was only a nominal one. The Spaniards refused to acknowledge him, and Napoleon only kept them in subjection by maintaining powerful armies in the peninsula under his favorite marshals, Soult, Massena and Suchet. After the battle of Waterloo Joseph emigrated to the United States, and resided at Bordentown, N.J., until the accession of Louis Philippe in 1830, when he returned to

BURNED THEM.

A MOTHER AND HER BABY SACRIFICED.

Possession. Georgetown, British Guiana, Jan. .- Savagery is certainly more primitively rampent in this colony than anywhere else in the British empire. This was illustrated by a ghastly case of double murder which was heard by the local magistrate the other day. Christie, a middle-aged Wapisians Indian of the Rupununi district, was charged with the murder of an infant, he child of an Indian woman named Kaliwa. About two years ago, or, as the Indian witness put it, about "two heavy rains," back, the wife of a "buck gave birth to twins. One of the chi dren died, and some time afterward the mother and the surviving child be came ill. Christie, a "marinow" or "paiman," was called in and asked to give his advice as a "medicine man, and, after holding an incantation, he decided that the child's father was not the woman's husband, Turuma, but an evil spirit.

The child, he explained, was not natural being, and, therefore, not to be permitted to die a natural death and as regarded the mother, he held that she was unfit to be a wife any onber. He urged her husband to take hem behind a mountain two miles away from the village and burn them; but the man, who seemed devoted to ME HAVE YOUR SALE his wife, delayed carrying out the 'medicine man's" orders for about three months. The "marinow," to show his displeasure at this neglect, burned down his own house and left the immediate neighborhood; but on several occasions he sent a few of his wives to urge the husband to burn the sick woman and her child, lest the evil spirit who was the infant's father should destroy the

At length one day the distressed husband placed his wife in a basket, took her into the forest, and, after he put her into a hammock, kindled a large fire under her.

Returning later, he buried the bones and some time later took to the forest, and during his absence some women in whose care the infant was left carried their little charge into bush and burned it on a wood pile in consequence of messages sent by the "medicine man."

"The logical consequence of this step would be the establishment of such examining boards in every province of Canada. Why should not other provinces adopt the principle of "protection" as well as Ontario? No university would be able to equip teach ers except for one province. The only possible form of an examining board therefore, would be a dominion board, impartially chosen from the whole country. That would be fair at least, but it would still, of course, exercise the detrimental influence on teaching which is inseparable from the system of external examination.

"The occasion of this resolution seems to have been the application of McGill University to have its graduates admitted as teachers in Ontario on specialist courses, similar to those of the Ontario universities. The resolution is a veiled form of "protecintroduces a principle of provincialism in education which will be an injury
