Henry Irving are a necessary means of expression with him. He is a man with slender limbs whose natural gait would probably lack the dignity necessary to one who plays heroic roles, Mr. Irving invented a stride for himself that, however, it may be burlesqued, cannot be called undignified. His whole carriage has a certain quality that suggests princeliness. The infirmity of his physique was the first by what have been dubbed mannerisms. Then there was the weakness of his voice. Who a century ago would have believed that an actor with voice at once light in quality and harsh in tone would hold the supreme position on the English stage for thirty years. Lacking the vocal power of Willard or a Forbes-Robertson, Irving devised for himself a means expression which though it be dividual as to easily be ridiculed nevertheless capable of conveying the most poignant meanings.
