According to this report there were in Japan in the year 1889, 297,428 marriages. The age of marriage seems to be nearer that commonly prevailing in

Of men only five married under the age of thirteen, and only 108 under age of sixteen. Nearly 5,400 married between the ages of sixteen and eighteen. The number of marriages increased rapidly up to the age of twenty-four, when it was rather more than 26,000. After that age fewer and fewer men married and less than a thousand married between the ages of fortyeight and forty-nine, though a few men married in extreme old age. In the case of girls there were on fifty-cight marriages under the age fourteen, and the age at which the greatest number of marriages was reported was between twenty and twenty-one. Only about 900 women were reported as marrying between the ages of forty and forty-one, but perhaps Japanese women are prone, like their western sisters, to cease having birthdays after they lyss thirty.
