Spider May Cause Death. Babylon, N.Y., April 20 .- Mrs. Ed ward C. Riess, wife of a prominent business man of this place, has been in a serious condition at her home here, suffering from a badly swollen inflamed arm, the result of a bite from a black spider.

She was taken ill a week ago, but at first paid little heed. Her arm. however, quickly began to swell and a physician was called. It became ne cessary in order to prevent the pois oned matter from spreading to blister her arm, and for several days sh suffered excruciating pain. Her arm swelled to twice its natural size and for a time it was feared that complications that might result fatally would ensue. The spider, it is believed, bit Mrs. Riess while she was sleep-

Critics of the day, much more candid held that the refusal of Sir Michael t provide necessary money for transpor to South Africa caused many of the serious hitches in the South African campeign. A CRISIS IN WOMAN'S LIFE. HICKS-BEACH was made up he shut it as tight and I as sharply as Dickens made Miss Murdstone snap together her reticule.

Unlike the amiable Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach recognized very clearly the truth of the old Latin saying that it is a vain thing to try and please "Sir Michael Hicks-Beach is not exactly a man gifted with a lofty imagination, and that he is a complete stranger to the glowing imperialist feeling of England to-day has long been perfectly evident. His refusal to help Mr. Rhode's great scheme of communication between South and North Africa, which so delighted the Little England Press and Sir William Harcourt, is but one instance out of many which show that his enthusiasm for what may be called the new national politics, if it exists at all, is kept under remarkably good control; and some people may still remember the awkward hitch about Australia and the duties on wines. At the commencement of Queen

Victoria's jubilee this tion was far from comfortable. It was then that he had been re-appointed for another term at the Irish office. His health was bad. His eyesight had become affected. And presently Mr. Bal four was ruling the office in his stead A great continental oculist cured the invalid, who soon returned, though never quite to the same prominent position in his party. The presidency the board of trade was at once turned upside down and emptied for his benefit; since 1895 he has been chancellor of the exchequer. But priar to his Sabbatical year, besides the last mentioned office, Sir Michael had held the leadership of the House of Only once, some six years ago die

this parliamentarian, whose chily manner had kept as an abstraction drop his veil for the moment, and the British had a glimpse of passion his dramatic declaration before the commons that the government was resolved to maintain the "open door" in China, "even at the cost of war. The popular imagination seized upon the phrase, and next morning Sir Mi chael found himself the most talked or man in the kingdom. But the lavish exploitation of his name, and the hysterical outery for war that followed were so little to his liking that he withdrew again quietly into his offici al shell, and, though the phrase i still remembered, Sir Michael is the last person in the cabinet to be identi fied with a rash and impulsive policy Perhaps the only other salient inci dent in his life was his later elevation to the House of Lords. If his party did not love him, they all respected him. He was not facetious, not original, and in addressing the House of Commons he gave the impression of a man repeating his periods from memory, and, as he ap peared to be often on the razor-edge of forgetfulness, the effect was rather painful. But he spoke with singular force, and could give new interest to the trite subject of finance by the happy faculty of conveying a vast amount of valuable information on the old theme in an extremely clear, and concise way. At times he used plain. down right English, where more diplomatic speakers prefer gentle lanruage. At the time of the Fashoda affair, when France exhibited a good deal of feeling against England, said that the latter was not on that account "to be worried out of Eq pt." Of a retiring disposition, he is the least known of any prominent English statesmen. He wears wretchedly cut clothes, seldom talks for publication and never submits to an in-

His Fersonal Appearance.

Very tall and spare, Sir Michael was as straight as a poplar. The umrella, without which he is rarely seen outside, looked strangely short as he swung it in his hand, crossing Palace ard, He has a thin, refined, though ruddy face, with delicate forehead, on which the hair curls slightly. The nose vas straight and the mouth rather ard, with the expression of a man accustomed to bitter thoughts. Feards are out of fashion among modern tatesmen, but Sir Michael was one of the few front bench men who aid not shave. At his short, dark beard, turning gray, he picked nervously with his taper ungers us he sie the treasury bench. He usually sat loof from the others, and listened to elate for a long spell without hanging a word with a colleague. For gossip of light talk he appeared to have no inclination. Many of the juestions which interest the metaphy sical mind of Mr. Balfour must appear to practical Sir Michael to be ain and idle.

When parliament was not sitting he was seldom in his office, but either at his London house or his country sent. etherhaven house, in Salisbury where he kept two alert private secretaries terribly busy; and he had third stationed at "the treasury" to ook after things there.

Sir Michael had a great knowledge of men and affairs, was a staunch hurchman, and an excellent represenative of the governing country genlemen and quarter sessions statesmen who have done so much for the honor and dignity of their country. "Agri ulture," he once, said, "is after all he greatest interest of England." He comes of a family—the Hickses—able 815.96. to trace their forebears back to the time of Henry VII. Campaign managers sometimes were othered in introducing a speaker vearing so awkward a name. At such imes he always passed as Sir Michael Hicks. The Michael in his name carries to Irish associations, but is an old cognomen long endeared to the fami-It has been said that the late chansellor of the exchequer had not the elentless logic, and caustic irony of ord Salisbury, nor the broad view and analytical mind of Mr. Balfour nor the sound judgment of the Duke of Devonshire, nor the great qualities as a leader and still greater qualities as a man of action which distinguishd Mr. Chamberlain, But Sir Michael Hicks-Beach has grown more rapidly than any of his colleagues in parliamentary reputation, and may be fairly reckoned among the soundert and most capable financiers of the Victorian era.

A DIFFICULT TRIP.

Through The Ice To The Cape By The Pierrepont. It was ten o'clock last night when the steamer Pierrepont arrived - back from Cape Vincent. Her trip over was arduous enough, but it was even worse coming back. Blockades of ice from six to eight feet were met and the progress was awfully slow. The steamer left the Cape at half-past three o' clock. After she got out a short distance, the thick ice again met her and for two hours she didn't proceed half a mile. The ice was coming down and hemming her in. The passengers thought they would be held fast the ice all night. However by half past seven o'clock, the old gunboat got to the foot of Wolfe Island, and out of the ice field. To day she made no attempt to re turn to the Cape. There was no con nection with that place to-day, ice-punts could not make their way across. To-morrow another attempt will be made. April 19th is a markably late date for the steamer reach the Cape.
