American women purchase not only their clothes in Europe, but even the materials of which they are made. It is a well known fact that American cotton goods excell in quality and beauty those of any other country. Yet, whenever some particularly fine or handsome material is produced by American mills, it is put on the market as imported from France or England. It is rather peculiar, that English merchants, to create a demand for lish merchants, to create a demand for lish merchants.
