PASSING OF THE NORTH KING'S ENGINEER.

Thomas Barlow Succumbed To curred Near Picton-The Remains Brought To His Home In Kingston. Thomas Barlow, engineer of the steamer North King, had a sudden death on Sunday morning, about six o'clock. During Saturday night he was seized with a weak spell, and was attended by a young doctor who was on board. The end came just as the steamer was leaving Picton. When the North King reached Kingston, Dr. Kilborn was summoned as coroner, but decided that there was nothing quiring investigation. He pronounced body was removed to the deceased's home on Johnston street.

The late Mr. Barlow was a native o England and came to Canada in his young days. For fully half a century he resided in Kingston. He was an employee of the locomotive works nearly all that time, and always regarded as an expert machinist. It was his duty to make the trial trips of locomotives sent out from the works, and to take them to their destination This he did for many years.

At times he was engineer aboard boats. Long ago he was engineer of the steamer Walter Shanley up the bay, and later on the steamer Hero. During the summers of the past two years he took charge of the engine of the steamer North King, in place of Mr. Hickey, who went on the steamer Caspian while it ran. Sunday was to have been Mr. Barlow's last trip, as Mr. Hickey was to have relieved him for the next two weeks. The trip proved indeed to have been his very
