THE MISTAKES OF POLICE BLAST MANY LIVES.

Errors Committed by English Authorities Send Scores of Innocent Persons to Prison, Who Are Compelled to Bear Stigma Of Crime.

London, Dec. 13. - Following so closely on the heels of the Beck scandal, the case of the Marylebone youths discharged from jail has a startling significance. The lads were arrested for attempting to pick pockets in the crowd while the king and queen of Portugal were driving from Paddington to the city, and on the police evidence they were sentenced to three months' hard labor.

After serving a week of their sentence they have been released on the bare announcement that the home secretary, "acting on the magistrate's recommendation, has advised the remission of the remainder of the sentences, and has authorized the immediate discharge of the prisoners." If that means anything, it means that the guilt of the young men was not proved, and that therefore they are innocent. But there is not a word in the document about innocence, regret, pardon, or compensation.

Should the conviction be brought up against the youths in private life hereafter—say, when they are applying for work—all that they can advance against the stigma on their characters is the cold language of the document ordering their release, for no reasons given.

This case, added to so many of a similar character that have occurred lately, adds a new terror to life. Since the Beck affair three such cases into the light of publicity the police reports have bristled with instances of wrongful conviction and mistaken identity, and in scarcely one of them has there been a hint of King's pardon or compensation.

The number of cases in which police "mistakes" are known to have occurred is so great as to be almost incredible. Nearly forty have been reported during the present year, and there must be many more of which nothing will ever be heard. The more prominent ones, briefly described, are as follows:

Francis Da Costa was sentenced to twelve months' hard labor at the Devon quarter sessions for fraud. On September 16th, he was released from Exeter jail by order of the home secretary. He had never ceased to protest his innocence, and is to-day insisting upon his right to a free pardon.

Richard Parry, a young laborer of Leeds, performed two weeks' hard labor on a charge of stealing two gold rings. He was arrested on the eve of his wedding, and strongly protested his innocence. Subsequently, on April 14th, he received a free pardon.

A York baker named Smalles, when arrested on October 1st, on a charge of robbing a woman of her pocket, was only liberated on October 12th, when another man confessed the offence.

Two flower girls, named Hudson and Pratt, were arrested in Tottenham on July 14th, on a suspicion of being accessories to a robbery. They were removed to Holloway jail for a week, where their long black hair was cut by a convict. At their next appearance at the police court they were discharged. This was subsequently the subject of a question of parliament.
