New York, Jan. 28. Either the vogue of the long coat called out the fashion for plain or flatly trimmed skirts or the vogue of this sort of a skirt is responsible for the long coat. At any rate, both have held sway in high places throughout the season. Winter materials naturally lend themries to ruffled and befrilled effects, but this season has seen the last degree of suppleness reached in textures that, by tradition, call for body, Velvets and silks long ago lost their rustle and crispness, to say nothing of "stand alone" qualities. But now all the wools partake as well of the "chiffon" inspiration. This tendency has led to the adoption of weaves for elaborate uses which were never before recognized by the elect. Take cashmere, for example, the material of childhood and of wrappers even it has been turned by dress-makers of the first class this winter into smart house gowns and even afternoon reception and visiting costumes, At its best, cashmere this senson has been seen in the skirt accompanying the velvet cont. Girls with a knack for naking much out of little have grasp ed the possibility, and in the durable fabric have produced white and tinted skirts which they have worn for evening even with silk and lace waists of the same tone, Often such bodices are made in a simplified French coat form, which means that bodice and basque are cut in one, the latter being shaped to suit the figure of wearer. There is a host of these little coats, and two of them are never As to the skirt trimmings,

Around the hem of a figured light talieta seen at the opera, this week there was a wide, loose, flat roll af velvet finished at the foot with a roll of the silk. A wide band of ermine headed an eight-inch lace frill at the foot of a white velvet princess robe. A black jetted net made over white had as a skirt finish at the bottom a ten-inch band of black velvet cut in shallow battlements at the top. V-shaped inserts to widen gores the foot of the skirt are another contrivance that appears naturally with tlaring skirts. There is an example of brocaded maize colored silk. The skirt fits at the top like a princess, and is plain for half its length. The back side seams and the side seams next the front breadth are left open. the back ones half the depth of the skirt; the front ones, for twelve inches.
