> London. William Winter writes the following criticism of Ibsen, in the New York Tribune: Ibsen's fundamental infirmity as a dramatist (aside from his infatuated devotion to the monotonous doctrine of beredity) is that he has set himself forth as a regulator; that he is forever vociferating that "the world is out of joint," and that it is a "cursed spite that ever Mr. Ibsen never will succeed in setting it right, and he will never succeed on the stage until he ceases to dull. His nasty plays make people and his pedantic ones make them "Ghosts" is a type of the former class. "An Enemy of the Mrs. Fiske, who has proven herself the most successful and artistic exponwho therefore writes with authority on the subject, says: "Properly to produce "Hedda Gabler" requires at least two years' study. It would not be extravagant to say that a play like Ibsen's 'Rosmersholm,' should occupy three years' study and preparation. Ibsen's plays have proved failures in some instances because stage managers will not devote sufficient time to their study and preparation. In this demand upon the producer Ibsen stands alone. The plays of Sar don and a great majority of modern playwrights, for instance, require n such preparation. Such plays bear the same relation to Ibsen that tuneful tricate purposeful scores of Wagner. The producer of the Ibsen play must
