TOM OF THE KINGS.

WESTMINSTER ABBEY HAS SECRET CRANNIES.

And These Are Very Seldom Seen Possessions of the State Long Reposed.

To the man who thinks he knows every nook and cranny of Westminster Abbey it will probably be a surprise to learn that there are many of its most ancient and interesting parts of which he has never even caught a glimpse.

For instance, in the eastern cloister is an ancient double door, so guarded against unauthorized intrusion that it can only be opened by seven keys, which are in the jealous custody of as many government officials.

Five of the keys to this wonderful door, which, by the way, is covered with human skins, are concealed from view by a stout iron bar which traverses the door.

This door gives access to a vaulted chamber known as the chapel of the Pyx, the walls of which were standing, as they stand to-day, before ever the Norman conqueror landed on the shores of Sussex.

One of the keys to this chamber was once the property of England, to which were brought "the most cherished possessions of the state."

The royal keys of the Scottish kings and of the Holy Cross and Holyrood were deposited here; for many a year it served as a mint for coining silver and gold; it was, centuries ago, the scene of a daring robbery, when treasure valued at £200,000, equal to-day to $10,000,000, was taken from it, and to-day it contains, in addition to a whole altar, some old chests, one of which is said to have held the jewels of Norman kings.

Not far away is a passage leading to the little cloister, the arched walls of which were built under the eyes of Edward the Confessor, nearly eight and one-half centuries ago, and which is said to be the original of the cloister of the original abbey, which have also stood since before the conquest, and adjacent to the high walls of the outside world, in which monks meditated and walked and prayed eight centuries ago.

Not far from this interesting relic of ancient days is the grey tower of Catherine's chapel, which was probably built within living memory of the conquest. The beautiful doorway of the chapel, which is still in use as the entrance to the cloister, is still to be seen traces of the high altar and a fireplace.
