When the lights are flashed on night, the theatre presents a pretty appearance. Colors, pleasing to the eye, take the place of the former plain walls, ceilings and arch. It's a pity that some change was not made the construction of the boxes, as these were never of attractive form. Another thing that would improve the house would be a brass rail extending around the rear of the orchestra scats, between which and the parquette there is a narrow aisle. Probably Mr. Small will yet do this, since he has done so much to beautify the house which he now owns. It might also be whispered to him to replace some of the old scenery, of which the patrons are really tired. A change would be welcomed, and especially a few drop curtains that would not land the villain on a business street when he should be somewhere else.
