It seems to us that would be a serious thing to remove municipal responsibility in this way To the fear of accidents and the dread of a bill of costs are largely due care exercised in keeping our streets and walks in as good a condition they are. Workmen, digging drains, moving blocks and repairing sidewalks, all have in mind the bil for damages that may result from carelessness on their part. The present system is a deterrent to accidents, and it would be as sensible to pass legislation protecting railways from suits arising out of carelessness in the management of their lines as to fre nunicipalities from responsibility.
