WHAT CHARLES D. BROWER KNOWS ABOUT IT.

Barrow, Northernmost Settlement on the American Continent is Considered the Loneliest and Dreariest Spot on Earth.

San Francisco Chroniele Charles D. Brower, who is in charge

ness toward the men engaged in the hazardous business of blubber hunting. He was principally instrumental in rescuing three hundred and sixty shipwrecked sailors in the summer of 1897, and maintained them at the station for an entire year, until succor arrived from the outside world, Many times he has risked his life in dragging the boats from wrecked vessels for a distance of forty miles or more, across the treacherous floes saving the half starved crews.

Brower has been living in Barrow for more than twenty-one years, and during that time has rarely ventured out into civilization. His existence is peculiarly secluded from rest of the world, from which communication any kind reaches him only during brief period of any year. For the remainder of the time he and his companions are ice bound and hear nothng from the rest of the world. There are not more than six or eight white persons in the little colony. The missionary, the teacher and their wives bring the number up to ten, and in some seasons to twelve The rest of the settlement consists of about 400 natives, who live at the point and in the adjacent villages When Brower went to Barrow he found 1,000 Eskimos or more, but their number is constantly diminishing through sickness and lack of medical attend ance. Brower tells how in 1902, he and the missionary buried 123 natives between September and Christmas a the result of a visitation of measles and a mild form of pneumonia.
