AS DESCRIBED BY AN ENG-LISH BANKER.

Feathered Fowls Must Have Gift of Speech-A Trial by Rooks-The Culprit Abjectly Cowed.

It is generally supposed that man only possesses the gift of speech; this supposition, however, must apparent be accepted in only a limited sense, for there can be no question that some animals and birds have the faculty of communicating intelligibly with each other; though probably in such a rudimentary degree that perhaps the term speech is a misnomer. Amongst the most remarkable evidence of this is the court of justice held by rooks which may occasionally be witnessed, (The writer can bear testimony to the first stage of these extraordinary sessions, which he witnessed from a train, though unfor tunately he did not see its strange, and perhaps tragic, termination.) A large flook of several hundred rooks forms a great circle two three deep, almost perfect in shape, and perhaps about three hundred feet in circumference. In the centre of the circle stands a solitary rook, attended by a guard-this latter, however, the house of mirth." the writer does not remember seeingangry manner, violently flapping their in keeping the Yellow river peaceable wings as if in a paroxysm of wrath | and quiet and fury, and from time to time raising their beaks upward, though they all maintained their position in ring, and made no attempt to interfere with the miserable prisoner. Probably the accusing bird had recounted the offence committed against t-perhaps the appropriation of the nest occupied by it and its mate for years, perhaps an insult offered her (for these birds are monogamous, and, it is believed, keep to same mate for life), or perhaps some more seri ous offence committed against it against the community. And then the angry discussion ensues, and the culprit is either condemned to death, is which case delegated executioners peck it to pieces; or it is perhaps punished allowed its liberty. -Now all this excited and angry cene must surely indicate that the pirds possess some means of com municating their ideas to each other, and that all that violent cawing cannot be mere unintelligible jargon. The limits of space 'orbid any reference to other strange evidences that many other members of the anima world-birds, animals, even, strange thought, perhaps also fishes, possess
