The first thing they did was to liberate the Russian political prisoners who were on the island. A Russian, now in London, interviewed by the Evening News, said that as far as was known there were about a dozen such prisoners, together with a number of Poles. "The saddest case," he says, "was, perhaps, Mme. The privilege had been withdrawn by the governor for some trivial offence. Try as they might to keep the rules there was always some thing that allowed the jailers to report prisoners for insubordination, so preserve the silence of death that enveloped the island fortress.
