It is indeed surprising how very few farmers take any interest in their sons interests and pleasures, except to discourage them, and how very few take the time to teach them to work easily and well. Some boys are interested plants, others in birds and insects, and if they are encouraged at all the pleasure they derive from these things will make their whole life bright, not to mention the training in neatness and accuracy they get by so doing There are too many things done on the farm to "keep the boys from getting spoiled," just as though they were colts. They dare not watch the carpenter or the lightning rod man the plumber or the painter at work for fear they might get lazy, when the boy, if granted such privileges, would be only too glad to work harder and longer to make up for the time thus spent. Ottawa Citizen. Was there a Canadian with Nelson on board the Victory? This question is answered in the affirmative by Dr. Morgan, of this city. The officer whose name will go down to posterity in this connection is, rather was (for he died in 1875), Admiral Sir George Augustus Westphal, who was born at Preston, Nova Scotia, March 27th, 1785. The son of a retired military of ficer, of high German extraction, young Westphal was so fortunate as to have a great uncle a dignitary of the Hanoverian church, who was preceptor to the Duke of Kent, the father of Queen Victoria, and he entered the Royal navy under the auspices of his royal highness. This, according to O'Bryne, was in 1798. After serving alternately on the North American, home and West Indian stations, as midshipman and master's mate, Westphal, in March, 1803, joined the Amphion 32, Capt. Thomas Masterman Hardy, and sailed in that frigate for the Mediterranean with Lord Nelson whom, on their arrival, he followed into the Victory 100. "In her," says O'Bryne, "after pursuing the combined fleets of France and Spain to West Indies and back, he fought at the battle of Trafalgar, October 21st, 1805, on which occasion, being severely wounded in the head, he was laid in the cockpit by the side of his dying chief." (Vide London Gazette, 1805, p 1484). Recovering from his wound, he subsequently ran a career remarkable for the many gallant, daring brilliant exploits credited to him. During the war of 1812 with the United States, he is said to have been more than a hundred times in action with the ene my. On one occasion, he was entrusted with over two million Spanish dollars in specie. Westphal attained captain's rank in 1819, was promoted rear admiral in 1851, and admiral in 1803, Knighted in 1824, after accompanying Earl Amherst, the new gov ernor-general, to India, Sir Robert Peel announced that the dignity "had been recommended especially, in consideration of his gallant and distinguished services against the enemy. supposed to be a prisoner, all he need- | In 1840, he was further honored by ed to do was to send the person's being appointed a naval aide-de-camp name in a letter addressed to Furyo; to the queen.
